Baltimore, MD 21201

Description

Innovations in organ transplant offer growing opportunities to save lives but raise new challenges and questions regarding how to interpret moral, religious, and spiritual obligations to one's self and others. If a loved one needs a kidney, are we obligated to offer ours? What's the difference between an obligation to a loved one versus one to a stranger? Who is most deserving of the limited supply of organs available for transplantation? What ethical and/or religious dilemmas or questions arise when organs for transplant are obtained from patients who are dead based on neurologic criteria ("brain dead") versus cardiac criteria (heart and breathing stopped) versus a live donor?

This educational program is designed to facilitate interprofessional learning. We welcome all health care professionals as well as lay persons interested in exploring these questions from the lens of ethics, religion, and spirituality, with an emphasis on how different health care professions contribute.
