New preconference this year! Revolutionary Informatics for the Nurse Executive

Overview

Health care organizations continue to make major investments in technology to provide high quality care, improve efficiency, and reduce costs. However, in many cases the technologies selected, purchased, and developed are underutilized, misused, or not used at all by nurses, one of the largest segments of care providers within an organization. When nurses can participate in the selection, design, testing, and evaluation, technology acquired is likely to be compatible with the work at the point of care and therefore have a greater positive impact. The Chief Nurse Officer (CNO) has a critical role in how an organization selects, implements, and adopts technology. He or she can create a culture of shared decision making, ensuring that staff members are active and engaged in the process. The CNO should be an equal partner in the C-suite and should, along with vendor CNOs, manage technology decisions by engaging and partnering with staff, top executives, and interdisciplinary colleagues.

However, many CNOs, may feel that they possess little knowledge or experience in this domain. This SINI preconference was developed to help fill that knowledge gap and provide CNOs with the tools they need to be visionary leaders and full partners in these important transformational processes.
